

Figuring out the NBA's Best By The Minute

Statistical Projections Help Managers Get Best From Individual Cards

While the rest of the world argues about whether Karl Malone really was the most valuable player in the NBA, Strat-O-Matic players are settling smaller issues, like who can come off the bench and make a key steal or hit a 3-pointer to send the game into overtime.

The basic NBA statistics can help, but most experienced players know the role players can be more effective over the short run. They want to know who to play when the game is on the line and a rebound, turnover or steal can make the difference between winning and losing.

To level the playing field, we projected player statistics to 48 minutes. That means the player who averages just 12 minutes per game and a modest eight points really looks like a 32-point-per-gamer performer when projected out to 48 minutes.

These numbers should be valuable to draft league coaches who need a player with special skills to come off the bench.

Stock league managers will find it helpful when assigning minutes to various players or trying to use them in the most effective manner.

For the teams, we selected the top seven players, according to minutes. In most cases, these players had at least 1,000 minutes and were solid contributors in the coach's rotation.

For the league leaders, we included all players with at least 800 minutes. All figures are projections to 48 minutes except the Minutes/Game category, which is the average number of minutes per game, a key figure in SOM's fatigue calculations.
